Caithness can be found in extreme North East of Scotland. As part of the Highlands of Scotland, this county naturally comes equipped with breathtaking beauty, spectacular mountains, majestic glens and mirror-like lochs that form the perfect backdrop to picturesque towns, isolated crofts, towering castles and pagoda-topped distilleries. A stunning variety of wildlife also makes its home in the sea-lochs and glens. Caithness is a bird watching paradise with birds of many species on the cliffs and inland on the bog or farming countryside. This is a unique county, framed by the sea on two sides and the mountains of Sutherland on the third. Even today it has a strong identity, which looks northward to Orkney and Shetland as much as South to the Highlands. Caithness has over 4000 monuments dating from Prehistoric right up the more recent Highland Clearances era. Most are virtually unvisited due to the remoteness of the region, the joy of this being that most of Caithness is unspoilt. The castles and monument sites are all free and are usually found on spectacular coastal sites or near waterways and in the low hills. The Castle of Mey is a wonderful, mystical starting point, it is located on the North coast of Caithness, in the parish of Canisbay.
